ALTC commissions good practice reports

After five years in operation, having funded more than 250 projects and 50 fellowships, the ALTC has announced it will commission a series of reports to deliver a summative evaluation of the work completed to-date.

The new reports will identify the good practice and useful outcomes from the final reports and resources of the 140 projects and 29 fellowships completed thus far.

Dr Carol Nicoll, CEO of the ALTC, said the reports will also act as an excellent indicator for the direction of future projects and fellowships.

“These reports will not only evaluate the work that has already been completed, but will assist us and future project teams in ascertaining the areas in which further work or development is appropriate,” she said.

Each report will also include a literature review of the good practices and key outcomes for teaching and learning from national and international research.

Good practice reports are being commissioned in the areas of: assuring graduate outcomes; blended learning; curriculum renewal; supporting students’ transition into higher education; work integrated learning; and assessment of science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) students.

The closing date for expressions of interest is 10 January 2011.

Successful applicants will receive funding of up to $25,000 and will have until 30 May 2011 to complete their reports.

A second round of reports will be commissioned in 2011.
